

CHRISTIAN RUMMELHOFF

Christian Rummelhoff has significant experience working with clients to help them understand the evolving IT infrastructure of their organization as it relates to information management, legal risk, and litigation disclosure and discovery demands.

As a Redgrave Analyst, and a non-practicing attorney, Christian leverages his experience to help clients develop records and information management programs and implement defensible litigation response processes allowing them to manage the preservation, identification, and collection of electronically stored information in the event of litigation, investigation, or audit. Christian works collaboratively with attorneys and technical specialists on the Redgrave team addressing eDiscovery and Records Management related issues including:

- Advising on social media and web content as they pertain to information management and discovery response challenges
- Advising on the management of legacy and orphaned data repositories
- Assessing technology-based information management and litigation hold solutions
- Coordinating information management and litigation response policies

Previously, Christian was a member of Nixon Peabody's Commercial Litigation practice group, focusing on Information Law matters. Prior to joining Nixon Peabody, Christian worked with Redgrave Daley Ragan & Wagner LLP. He also spent more than eight years in data analysis, including managing the data processing department of a media research company.
